Alumni Spotlight: Ali Anderson, MPH

Ali Anderson 13PH found her own way to address food justice and health equity in historically disenfranchised communities of color. In June 2020, she founded Feeding Black Futures (FBF), a mutual aid organization committed to Black food sovereignty. The organization works to supply Black mothers and caregivers in the greater Los Angeles area with local and organic produce from Black and Brown farmers, and strengthens their capacity to grow their own food. Read on to learn more about Ali and her work through FBF.
Volunteer Leader Spotlight: Christopher DeVore, MPH

Rollins alumni are leaders, and Christopher DeVore 18PH, is no exception to that fact. He currently works as the legislative director for Congresswoman Alma S. Adams on Capitol Hill. He is also the co-chair of our regional alumni group in Washington, DC (RollinsDC). In addition to his legislative work, Chris dedicates a portion of his free time to building an active Rollins alumni community in the DMV as a regional volunteer leader. Read more about Chris and his work both in and out of the office.

The desire and need for more flexible schedules and greater work-life balance is on the rise. While not all employers are on board, the trend towards non-traditional, flexible working arrangements is unmistakable and the savvy employer knows that staff satisfaction and retention relies on happy employees.

On the flipside, the shrewd employee knows that the trick to effectively advocating for flexibility is convincing your manager that the situation benefits the company just as much as it does you.

So how do you convince your manager to be open to part-time schedules, unconventional hours, job-sharing or remote work? Consider these tips before you hit up your boss for a flexible working arrangement.
