Alumni Spotlight: Amanda Williams, MPH

In this issue we catch up with Rollins alumna, Amanda Williams 16PH, to talk about her work in men's health. Amanda discusses her path to working in a non-governmental public health organization and details what it's like to work as a program manager on HIV-related projects. Read.

Student Spotlight: Elizabeth Long 19PH and Jessie Seiler 19PH

Frustrated by the slow response to the crisis in Puerto Rico after Hurricane Maria made landfall in September, two current Rollins students took action and found their own way to help. Read how they helped those living in dangerous conditions in Puerto Rico.

Mark Your Calendar: All in a Day

Last year, Rollins raised over $27,000 in 24 hours during Emory's first annual "All in a Day" giving campaign. Our alumni, students, faculty, and staff joined together to make a difference by contributing to student scholarships, AIDS research, global safe water programs, and much more. The second annual "All in a Day" will take place in February with more details coming soon, including how to make a contribution and how to double, triple, or even quadruple your gift through matching challenges.

Why I Give to Rollins...

I give to an established Rollins School of Public Health scholarship in the name of a treasured mentor to honor their service to Emory but primarily because I witness the incredible work being done by so many Rollins graduates, many of whom would not be able to do the work they do now without having received financial assistance in school. In my experience, all public health students are sincerely interested in doing as much good after graduation as possible, and anything I can do to support their educational goals now (and, indirectly, to the future good they will do) is money well invested.
